ELLE GOURMET RYAN JENNINGS

SATURDAY NIGHT FEVER

Why do we hate jet-setting party girls so much? Maybe it's their impeccable timing. Look at Paris Hilton, heiress to the Hilton hotel dynasty. She couldn't be more now — and neither could hotels. Coincidence? I think not. Hotels are once again the Saturday night destination for trendy urbanites. And whether it's a modern boutique hotel, a trendy refurbished dive or a five-star high-rise with all the fixings, hotels are serving up some of the best cuisine in the country. In December, ground was broken for The Hazelton, Toronto's first five-star hotel, and the buzz has already started for its restaurant, One, headed by chef Mark McEwan. "A tuxedo and fine bone china do not make a five-star experience," he says. "The best hotels have a cool luxury about them and should make you feel the same. The food at One will be welcoming seven days a week — exquisite but recognizable." Jeeves, get my bags. I'm checking in!
